Dear Camilla

I hope you are well and having a good Summer.

We have had a great deal of interest in BEP and I wanted to enquire if it would be helpful to arrange a time to meet and have a conversation about BEP and international student recruitment opportunities.

If convenient, perhaps we could get a date in the diary before the new school year begins.

I look forward to hearing from you.

Best wishes,

John

Dear Andrew

Sue has passed this on to me. It would be great to arrange a call with your team to hear more about it.

We are very active internationally and recruit 30 - 40 new students from overseas every year.

Please suggest some times w/c 20th July for a call.

I look forward to hearing from you.

With very best wishes

Camilla

This is the first time you've received an email from this sender. Make sure this is someone you trust.

Dear Sue,

Thanks so much for our LI message exchange and your interest in my 'secret new project'! I am delighted you saw my post as you are on a select list of schools we've identified that fit our criteria for academic and brand attractiveness to international families....

I've been part of the thinking and positioning behind a new venture that I believe could change how schools approach international recruitment, and how much they get out of their agency networks.

I don't need to tell you how competitive and prized that part of your community has become. Schools across the country are telling me their pipelines have gone sticky, and that converting the agency leads they're handed is harder than it used to be. Nobody's pretending it's easy out there.

Which is why I think there's room for a challenger in international recruitment, in the same way we've seen other core parts of running a school, catering being the obvious one, professionalised and brought into integrated outsourcing.

To cut to the chase: British Enrolment Partners (BEP) launched quietly this week and will run the international enrolment function for a handpicked group of British boarding schools. The markets, the agents, the applications and the in-territory work, handled as one coordinated operation rather than a scatter of separate relationships.

It's worth saying who's behind it. Ying, BEP's Founder and CEO, brings a global network of agents and offices across Europe, Asia and LATAM, and is a successful boarding school proprietor in their own right. John, Head of Partnerships, is an experienced international pupil and agency recruiter who knows this side of the work inside out.

The tagline is “your always-on international enrolment office”. The line that matters more is this: the model is built to bring down the cost of running your international recruitment function while guaranteeing a wider pool of right-fit agents and new enquiries. In practice the aim is to do both at once, trimming what you currently spend on international recruitment while widening the enquiries coming in, with the combined effect running well into six figures in your favour across a year.

Sounds too good to be true? I'd want proof too. Which is why BEP starts with a no-cost, no-obligation audit of your current international coverage: your agents, your process and where your pupils are coming from, set against the markets and pupil profile you want. It's carried out under an NDA, with a written undertaking not to approach or work around any agent it sees. It's diagnostic, so where your setup is already strong, they'll tell you.

I've attached the Founding School Partner prospectus, which should answer a good deal up front, but the best next step would be a short call between your team and the BEP team.

BEP isn't interested in schools chasing numbers for their own sake. It wants schools that are confident in who they are and what they offer, but recognise that, for whatever reason, that strength isn't translating into the international boarding numbers it should. The idea is simple: BEP plays to its enrolment strengths so you can focus on yours.

BEP will only work with a small number of schools this founding year, and we're onboarding the first now, with the focus on bedding the model in well before we add more. So there's something to be said for looking sooner rather than later.

If you'd like to line up the audit or put any questions to us on a call or by email, just let me know. Even on its own the audit carries real strategic and commercial value for a board and leadership team, whatever you decide to do next.

Best wishes as always,

Andrew
