Dear Mark and Sarah,

I hope you and your team have come through this difficult week in reasonable shape. It's been pretty unbearable in Oxford!

As we near the end of term and the school year, I wanted to drop you a quick note about an international boarding recruitment project I'm now involved in.

Before I go any further, I appreciate that a brand like Repton will be fortunate to be in very high demand across the globe but wanted to share a bit more because I'm conscious that you are both always on the look out for new ideas and perhaps this offering may be of interest to some of the other schools Repton has/will welcome into the family.

I've been part of the thinking and positioning behind a new venture that I believe could change how schools approach international recruitment, and how much they get out of their agency networks.

I don't need to tell you how competitive and prized that part of your community has become. Schools across the country are telling me their pipelines have gone sticky, and that converting the agency leads they're handed is harder than it used to be. Nobody's pretending it's easy out there.

Which is why I think there's room for a challenger in international recruitment, in the same way we've seen other core parts of running a school, catering being the obvious one, professionalised and brought into integrated outsourcing.

To cut to the chase: British Enrolment Partners (BEP) launched quietly this week and will run the international enrolment function for a handpicked group of British boarding schools. The markets, the agents, the applications and the in-territory work, handled as one coordinated operation rather than a scatter of separate relationships.

It's worth saying who's behind it. Ying, BEP's Founder and CEO, brings a global network of agents and offices across Europe, Asia and LATAM, and is a successful boarding school proprietor in their own right. John, Head of Partnerships, is an experienced international pupil and agency recruiter who knows this side of the work inside out.

The tagline is “your always-on international enrolment office”. The line that matters more is this: the model is built to bring down the cost of running your international recruitment function while guaranteeing a wider pool of right-fit agents and new enquiries. In practice the aim is to do both at once, trimming what you currently spend on international recruitment while widening the enquiries coming in, with the combined effect running well into six figures in your favour across a year.

Sounds too good to be true? I'd want proof too. Which is why BEP starts with a no-cost, no-obligation audit of your current international coverage: your agents, your process and where your pupils are coming from, set against the markets and pupil profile you want. It's carried out under an NDA, with a written undertaking not to approach or work around any agent it sees. It's diagnostic, so where your setup is already strong, they'll tell you.

I've attached the Founding School Partner prospectus, which should answer a good deal up front, but the best next step would be a short call between your team and the BEP team.

BEP isn't interested in schools chasing numbers for their own sake. It wants schools that are confident in who they are and what they offer, but recognise that, for whatever reason, that strength isn't translating into the international boarding numbers it should. The idea is simple: BEP plays to its enrolment strengths so you can focus on yours.

BEP will only work with a small number of schools this founding year, and we're onboarding the first now, with the focus on bedding the model in well before we add more. So there's something to be said for looking sooner rather than later.

If you'd like to line up the audit, or put any questions to us on a call or by email, just let me know. Even on its own it carries real strategic and commercial value for a board and leadership team, whatever you decide to do next.

Best wishes as always,
Andrew
